

Concept

The term "pragmatic literacy" is employed primarily, although not exclusively, to describe texts and documents that emerged following the increase in writing during the 11th and 12th centuries. This field of research focuses on documents and manuscripts produced in judicial or administrative contexts as well as for the transaction of business. Furthermore, it covers a comprehensive overview of the full spectrum of document production, encompassing their materiality, copying and archival handling of documents, and so forth. Additionally, a more comprehensive analysis was conducted to examine the political, social, and administrative practices and requirements that could influence not only the production of texts in general, but also their form and content.

The workshop employs Clanchy's phases of "Making - Using - Keeping" to evaluate the significance of the documents for various actors and to delineate and analyse the consequences this had for the evolution of the documents.

Based on case studies we will discuss whether "pragmatic literacy" can be developed into an interdisciplinary research paradigm that is capable of analysing the complexity of documentary writing practices.
